He stated we can trace our identity by going back to Africa. He stated that human beings settled in Africa would have migrated to different parts of the world. The value system which emerged some years ago is ingrained in our culture. According to him Greek and Roman civilisation were primitive democracies. He stated that the value system which emerged in India was exclusive in many ways. The dominant philosophy in our society was based on fault lines of caste and gender. He stated that our government have used the parameter of caste and gender for a long time. With a result Dalits have been at the receiving end. We have replaced the word men with humankind. His session highlighted how gender inequality existed in India right from the ancient times. He pointed out how in our society women are being oppressed which is reflected in the language we use. He stated although the constitution of India has abolished untouchability, we still observe the practice in cities

His session emphasised the role of younger generation in transforming the values. He pointed out that teachers have an important role to play in inculcating the right values in the younger generation. He stated that the diaspora in America is reactionary. They are fighting for our farmers and some of them have migrated to America to enjoy the secular values. He firmly stated that our younger generation should protect our constitution by asserting the values. He stated that our generation has done the duty as elders to help the younger generation in the spirit of inquiry. Madhavi Sathe, the IQAC coordinator of our college took over the question-and-answer session. The participants raised many questions on caste and gender neutrality.
